

Regarding proposed rule changes affecting LPFM stations, and priority over current FM translator service:

I am opposed to changes of the current rules, because I am very fond of a national broadcaster called K-LOVE, which broadcasts Christian contemporary music. I do not want them blotted out one day by a local transmitter offering the same-old same-old secular music, which seems to consist largely of people wailing inconsolably about broken relationships. (I once heard it said of upcoming female artists, for that reason, "They all write the same songs.") By contrast, K-LOVE's fare is, as advertised, much more positive and uplifting, and it is much more comforting in a callous, dog-eat-dog world. Hearing about God's love can make all the difference when you're having a bad day. The music is also much more family-friendly - no worries about having to explain obscene lyrics to your kids. Listen yourself, and you'll hear the difference. If the proposed rule changes go forward, all this could be lost, in exchange for yet another station providing the same dreary glop we already have plenty of.
